

Noella Ukpe-Roberts
CC Zhang

The image features a collage of Gifford's ice cream packaging at the top and bottom. The top row includes 'FLY FISHING', 'FROZEN YOGURT BLACK RASPBERRY', and 'DOUGH'. The bottom row includes 'CAMPFIRE S'MORES', a chocolate ice cream scoop, and 'PINK PEPPERMINT STICK'. The central text is set against a white background with a dark blue arrow pointing right.

Why Rush?

In Maine, nothing's ever too far. The farms, the fields, the people — they're all just part of everyday life. So when Gifford's says they don't take shortcuts, it's not a slogan — it's simply how things are done here.

We Don't Take Shortcuts :30

Open to an elementary school class field trip to Gifford's ice cream production factory. Each kid is enjoying they're own small cup of Gifford's ice cream. The tour guide, dressed in full Giffords-branded attire, guide leads them through the ice-cream making process.

Tour Guide: Our mixing tanks help us blend each flavor into the base before we put it in the freezer for some slow churning. This helps us reach maximum creaminess—Yes?

A child in the crowd has his hand raised.

The child: Why not just feed the ingredients to the cows?

Tour Guide: What?

Child: Like feed the cows strawberries to make strawberry milk, then freeze it to make the ice cream?

Tour Guide: Oh, no, not another one.

The tour guide reluctantly makes a nod signaling Gifford's Security guards, who promptly pick up the kid and carry him off the premises. The children, watching in confusion, look up at the Tour Guide.

Tour Guide: (apologetically) We don't take shortcuts here, kids.

SUPER/LOGO: Giffords. No shortcuts. Ever.

