Introduction

Brand Background

- Want Want built nationwide fame in the 1990s–2000s through iconic TV commercials, catchy slogans, and the Wang Zai mascot
- Gen Z, however, lives in a short-video-driven ecosystem
- Media shifted from one-way broadcasting to participatory creation
- Nostalgia stayed strong — but media presence did not follow

Want Want is more than a snack

It's a shared memory for an entire generation.
But nostalgia alone is not enough in the digital era.

Past vs. Present

Past: The TV Era

- Nationwide reach through TV commercials
- Shared family viewing moments
- High cultural imprint of Wang Zai mascot
- Instant brand familiarity

Present: The Short-Video Era

- Gen Z consumes content through Douyin / Rednotes / IG Reels
- Algorithm-driven feeds replace scheduled TV
- Brands must be participatory, expressive, and constantly present
- Culture spreads through filters, memes, and user-generated content

Want Want's nostalgic assets remained strong but the brand did not transition from broadcast media to short-video culture.

Problem Statement

Want Want's emotional equity remains strong, but its media presence has not kept up with Gen Z's behaviors.

- Gen Z rarely encounters Want Want in their short-video feeds
- Nostalgia cannot be activated without consistent digital presence
- A cultural icon becomes "familiar but forgotten" when it disappears from daily media touchpoints

Want Want is not outdated — it is simply under-present in the media Gen Z lives in.

Consumer Insight

Gen Z Nostalgia Needs Re-Activation

- Growing up, Want Want felt fun, playful, and emotionally warm
- But as we become adults, the emotional connection fades from daily life

- Gen Z wants brands that feel engaging, participatory, and present
- Nostalgia only works when it is actively triggered, not passively remembered

To stay relevant, nostalgia must be reactivated through playful, interactive, and memorable digital moments.

Opportunity

- Want Want owns highly recognizable nostalgic assets — Wang Zai mascot, playful slogans, iconic packaging
- Gen Z loves emotion-driven, participatory content — filters, memes, mood expression
- Short-video culture rewards brands that are playable, expressive, and easy to remix
- Want Want's nostalgic personality is naturally suited for this ecosystem — but is underactivated today

Bring Want Want's existing playful identity into short-video platforms, turning nostalgia into a daily, interactive cultural presence again.

→ Strategy

“WANT WANT NOW NOW”

Bring back the childhood snacks
we loved — in a way that feels

Present
Fun
Made for Today

A playful glow-up — not a rebrand, but a brand reactivation.

- Reintroduce Want Want’s iconic assets in short-video formats
- Embed Gen Z humor, memes, and expressive content styles
- Activate Want Want’s playful personality through interactive tools
- Transform nostalgia from passive memory into participatory media moments

Bring Want Want into today’s platforms, without changing the personality people love

Concept

“WANT WANT NOW NOW”

–Your childhood’s favorite is back in your life.

- Brings Want Want’s iconic nostalgia into the media spaces where Gen Z actually lives
- Uses today’s expressive short-video formats—filters, ASMR, mood content, memes
- Transforms nostalgia from something remembered into something experienced again
- Keeps Want Want’s original personality, presented through Gen Z’s modern media behaviors

Expected Impact

Increased Visibility in Gen Z's Daily Feed

- Consistent short-video presence makes Want Want visible again on Douyin, RED, and Reels.

Higher Participation Through Interactive Tools

- Filters, ASMR, stickers, and meme formats drive UGC creation and emotional expression.

Renewed Purchase Intent

- Nostalgia becomes active rather than distant, improving snack consideration in daily moments.

Stronger Cultural Relevance

- Wang Zai reenters Gen Z culture through humor, remixability, and emotional formats.

Want Want moves
from
Being Remembered
to
Being Seen Again.

Conclusion

Want Want has always been more than a snack — it's a shared memory.

But memories only stay alive when they stay visible.

"WANT WANT NOW NOW" brings Want Want back into the daily media habits of Gen Z — by reactivating its playful nostalgia through the short-video culture they live in.

Your childhood fave is back in your life.

WANT WANT, NOW NOW

Thanks for watching
